

Conclusions

In conclusion many famous men and women throughout history have left their marks through the power of their words. The weapons or tools of persuasion they choose to fight their battles may differ, just as Edwards and Henry use different rhetorical devices to convince their listeners. Still both men build effective arguments according to their own beliefs. Both the speech and the sermon appeal to their audiences. It convinces them to change their mind one way or another.

Rhetorical devices such as imagery appeal to emotion and reason, metaphors, and rhetorical questions <sup>A</sup> have been used by famous people who have left their marks in history. Jonathan Edwards and Patrick Henry both used a large amount of rhetorical devices to persuade their audiences through their words and build effective arguments toward their beliefs.

110

<sup>the</sup> Be it through fear and intimidation or by reason and logic these two men are able to get <sup>the</sup> audiences to follow them through the use of literary devices. Both of these methods work and are very powerful and convincing. The use of these devices worked for these men and convinced thousands of people to become puritan and us to have our independence from Britain.